RICHIE RICH in RICHIE'S FILM FESTIVAL

It had all started at the traditional Rich Family Saturday morning breakfast.

Every Saturday morning, Richie, his Mom and his Dad sit down for a long, long conversation in the estate's fifty-foot breakfast room, the talk punctuated by a meal consisting of eggs, cereal, waffles or pancakes, juice, milk or coffee, and a choice of ham, bacon, sausage or steak. And, of course, Chef Pierre always has some special Saturday morning dessert as a topper. On this particular Saturday, it was Pierre's special thirty-four layer cake, each layer a different flavor.

"This is superb!" Richie called to Pierre, as the young master of the Rich Mansion took his first bite of the cake.

"Thank you, Monsieur Richie," answered the happy chef, poking his head out of the enormous kitchen. "I make it special for you. I knew zey are your zirty-four favorite flavors!"

All the Riches laughed at zat—that is, that.

"I'm sure no one has ever made a cake like this before," chuckled Mr. Rich, "even in the movies!"

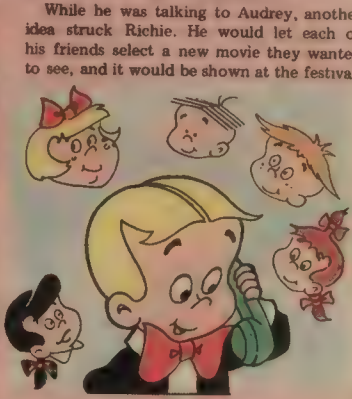
"Say, Dad," said Richie, a sudden thought seeming to light up his face, "speaking of movies, do you think I could have a film festival for some of my friends?"

"Sure," said his agreeable father. "You could use the house film theatre for it, too."

The Rich house film theatre, by the way, is big enough to show Cinerama, can be transformed into a multi-screen theatre, has quadrophonic sound and has a seating capacity of 750. For a theatre in the home, there is no equal in the world.

But getting back to the story . . . Richie kissed his Mom and Dad and literally flew out of the room. He wanted to call his friends and tell them all about it.

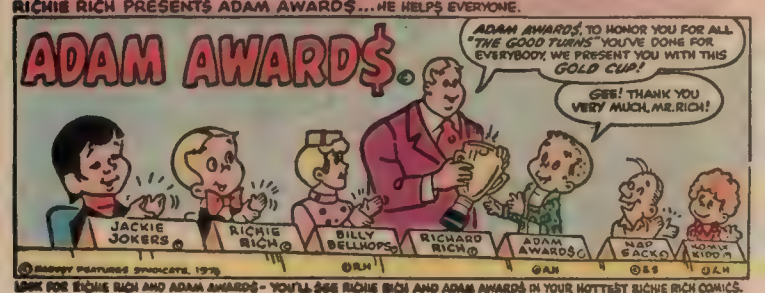
While he was talking to Audrey, another idea struck Richie. He would let each of his friends select a new movie they wanted to see, and it would be shown at the festival.



"Oh, I would love to see 'The Great Gatsby,' " said Audrey. "I've heard so much about its great sets and beautiful clothes. It's story is supposed to be lovely, and my mother says it captures the feelings of the 1920's so well."

"One 'Great Gatsby' coming up," said Richie. Then he dialed Dot Polka's number.

"I know what film I want to see," said Dot. "My father hasn't stopped talking about Woody Allen's new film, 'Sleeper.'



And, to tell you the truth, Dad falls asleep at most movies—and he sure didn't fall asleep at 'Sleeper.' He says it's one of the funniest films he's ever seen."

That took care of two of the new films to be shown at the festival. Lotta took care of the third.

"Oh, Richie," she sighed, "I would love to see 'Conrack.' You see, it's all about this terrific teacher who . . . "

"Hold on," Richie laughed. "I don't want to know too much about it, Lotta. I want to enjoy the newness and surprise of it for myself."

Richie's friend Freckles selected the fourth film.

"Richie," he pleaded, "I've been dying to see 'The Three Musketeers.' It's exciting and adventurous and funny, too. The color of the film, the backgrounds, the acting are supposed to be so sensational. It's based on Dumas' famous story, you know, and I've heard it's the most authentic version ever filmed."

"Gosh, Freckles," interrupted Richie, "you sound just like a film critic."

"Well," said Freckles, "I guess I really am. I've just been picked as film critic for our classroom newspaper. Everybody knows how I love movies."

"Wow!" said a happy Richie. "Congratulations, Freckles. I'm so happy for you."

"Thanks," said Freckles, blushing. He was happy for himself.

"And say," Richie told Freckles, "would you please ask your brother PeeWee what new picture he would like to see."

"Just a minute," said Freckles, and got off the phone so he could talk to PeeWee. At least Freckles spoke to PeeWee—PeeWee had never spoken a word in his life, though there were all kinds of ways he was able to communicate. This time he wrote his message clearly and distinctly on a piece of paper.

"I have PeeWee's favorite new picture," said Freckles to Richie, as he returned to the phone. "PeeWee wants to see 'King Kong.' "

" 'King Kong?' " blurted out Richie, not sure he could believe what he heard. "That's not a new picture, Freckles. It was produced in the 1930's!"

"Well, it sure is new for PeeWee, Richie. He saw it for the first time last night—and he can't wait to see it again."

Richie burst out laughing. "Then he's going to see it at the film festival!"

And that's how they arranged the program for the Richie Rich Film Festival of New Films. It was mobbed with happy, happy kids from all over the neighborhood. They sat entranced for almost ten hours of film, eating pounds and pounds of popcorn.

Can you guess which was the favorite of the new films? Yep. 'King Kong'!
